In a world where stereotypes often confine individuals, Lecile Harris emerged as a beacon of defiance and inspiration. Her journey as a Black cowgirl shattered preconceived notions, proving that determination and resilience can overcome any obstacle.

'Lecile This Ain My First Rodeo' invites you to witness the captivating story of a woman who dared to dream beyond the boundaries, paving the way for future generations.

From Humble Beginnings to a Rodeo Calling

Growing up in rural Mississippi, Lecile Harris was surrounded by the traditions and values of cowboy culture. Despite the challenges she faced as a Black woman in the predominantly white rodeo world, she discovered her passion for riding and competing at a young age.

Inspired by her grandfather, a former rodeo performer, Lecile honed her skills, determined to make her mark in the arena.

Conquering the Arena

As Lecile entered the rodeo circuit, she encountered prejudice and discrimination from fellow competitors and spectators. Yet, she refused to be deterred. With unwavering determination, she persevered, showcasing her exceptional horsemanship and barrel racing abilities.

In 1981, she made history by becoming the first Black woman to qualify for the National Finals Rodeo (NFR), the pinnacle event in the sport. Her presence on the NFR stage shattered barriers and served as a beacon of hope for aspiring cowboys and cowgirls.

A Trailblazing Inspiration

Lecile Harris's legacy extends far beyond her competitive accomplishments. She emerged as a role model and mentor for countless young people, particularly those from underrepresented communities.

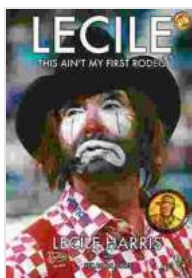

Through her unwavering spirit and dedication to her craft, she challenged societal norms and proved that dreams could be realized regardless of one's background or identity.
